A Brighter Future

How often does one get to watch the lights come on in a place that has never had the benefit of electricity?

That was the experience of SMPA CEO, Brad Zaporski, this past September. Zaporski recently joined an outreach team that brought gifts to a remote village in Guatemala and that oversaw a crew of Colorado and Oklahoma lineworkers as they extended electric power infrastructure to the site.

A small village of 560 people, La Montanita de la Virgen now can access electricity in 81 homes, 2 churches and the local school. During the three-week endeavor, the joint-state team installed 77 power poles and strung 8.5 miles of primary and secondary line up and down mountainsides, and through thick forests.

Zaporski and the leadership team also delivered 100 water filters and 100 kids back packs filled with supplies to the villagers. With extra donations from the Oklahoma Energy Trails Foundation, they were also able to buy a couple of fans and help the school build a new bathroom.

The village showed its thanks with a major celebration and lighting ceremony. The students performed songs, poems and dances for their visitors from the U.S. "Today, a dream becomes a reality," said Roberto Ramirez Guerra, the Village Mayor. "Electricity is not a luxury, it's a necessity. Your work will be remembered forever."

'Deferred Revenue:' the Financial Shock Absorber

When an athlete wants to increase their strength, they ramp up their training, but they do so gradually, to avoid injury. This same principle can apply to cooperative finance as well.

A number of factors, including a worldwide supply chain squeeze, material inflation and uncertainty about the future cost of wholesale power are signaling a likely increase in the cost of distributing electricity to our members. If this cost rises significantly, SMPA may need to recover more revenue through increased rates, but we would want to do it in a way that avoids a shock.

That's where "deferred revenue" can help. In a non-profit system, revenue that remains after the cooperative covers expenses and meets lending ratio requirements, can be partially deferred for use at a future time. SMPA has been using this strategy for several years to create a financial "shock absorber" that can buffer the effects of a large rate increase. This can give members a chance to adjust to an increase while temporarily shielding them from volatile market conditions.

As we strengthen our cooperative to meet the challenges of the future, it's prudent to give our members time to adjust.

Co-ops Respond to the Destruction of Hurricane Ian

“In tough times like these, the core cooperative principle of cooperation among cooperatives takes on new meaning,” said Randy Shaw, CEO of Peace River Electric Cooperative in Wauchula, Florida as more than 1,000 line technicians, vegetation management contractors and support personnel worked 16-hour shifts to assess and repair damage since Hurricane Ian slammed into southwest Florida with 155 mph winds.

Co-op crews, backed by hundreds of mutual aid personnel from electric co-ops in eight states, helped get thousands of members reconnected as quickly and as safely as possible. Cooperation like this is inspiring. We hope for continued repair and healing in Florida, and salute the Cooperatives that donated time and resources to the effort!
